Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: ...Dow, Mieris, and many others; yet the bolder styles, in the hands of a master, hold so high a rank, that no comparison can be instituted between them. When we regard the works of those who have excelled in the various manners, we seldom or ever wish that they should have been otherwise; for if we compare the exquisitely finished cattle pieces of Berghem and Wouvermans with the bold and embossed style of Rosa da Tivoli, one cannot well imagine how either could be converted into the other without serious detriment; and the imitations of Rosa da Tivoli by Berghem or Wouvermans would be as little desirable as the imitation of the latter by Rosa da Tivoli, had such imitations ever taken place; for the completeness of character and manner would have been absent in all; and as it constantly happens that every artist falls into a manner of his own, or style of painting as peculiar to himself as his own hand-writing, the best advice we can offer is, to cultivate that style or manner to the utmost, by discarding whatever is trite or vulgar, and to regard his pencilling as a refined symbolic writing, to be as much under his command, when painting, as his pen in writing, avoiding, most carefully that idle and commonplace style that some fall into, by adopting particular flourishes of the pencil to express particular things. That the pencilling should be suited to the subject is evidenced by the pictures of Salvator Rosa, where we find, in the savage scenery and accompanying banditti, a bold and rough style of pencilling well suited to the intention of the artist in what he had to express; but this manner would not so well suit the beautiful and placid scenery of Claude Lorraine, as his own more finished and quiet, happy manner. But again, this finished style would be ...
